The New York Times

Dear Hiring Manager,

I am writing to express my interest in the role of Investigative Journalist at The New York Times. With seven years of experience in journalism and a passion for uncovering the truth, I am confident that I would be an asset to your team.

As an investigative journalist, I have worked on a variety of high-profile stories that have made a significant impact. My biggest achievement was my investigation into corruption within the local government that led to several officials being charged and convicted. This story not only garnered national attention but also resulted in policy changes that improved transparency and accountability.

My curiosity and determination to get to the bottom of a story have been my driving force throughout my career. I possess excellent research skills and am adept at cultivating sources, which has allowed me to break exclusive stories and provide in-depth analysis on complex issues.

I am also skilled in data analysis, which has proven to be invaluable in uncovering hidden patterns and connections. In my previous role, I used data analysis to reveal discrepancies in government spending that ultimately led to a major investigation by federal authorities.

My best qualities include my tenacity, attention to detail, and ability to work under pressure. I thrive in fast-paced environments and am always willing to go the extra mile to ensure accuracy and quality in my work.

I am excited about the opportunity to join The New York Times, a renowned publication known for its dedication to journalistic integrity. I believe my skills and experience make me an ideal candidate for this role.

Thank you for considering my application. I look forward to discussing how I can contribute to your team further.

Sincerely,

Emily Parker
